From a lifelong passion to a debut release.

Introducing Marie Jo

Growing up with the music of Beyoncé, Celine Dion, Whitney Houston, the Carpenters and ABBA, Marie Jo developed a broad musical outlook. A musical family and her experience singing in a church choir helped shape her voice and her approach to soulful pop and urban music.

Alongside her creative ambitions, Marie Jo built a career as a full-time nurse, becoming a Deputy Sister on her ward within two years of qualifying. Music remained a passion she pursued quietly until she was introduced to artist and producer Djinn.

Their collaboration opened a new chapter. Together, they developed an album's worth of material, including collaborations with Japanese guitarist Seiji Igusa. At the time of her debut, Marie Jo also named Jacob Collier and singer-songwriter Sam Way among the artists she hoped to work with.

With "What Lovers Do", Marie Jo takes that once-hidden passion into the spotlight, beginning a recording career shaped by her musical upbringing and a desire to bring light, love and positivity to her listeners.
